Asset management strategy

OFI Precious Metals gained 10.21% in January.

All precious metals gained ground in the month. Gold gained just over 6%, while silver, platinum and palladium all gained more than 10% in the month.

There were a number of factors behind this rise. Generally speaking, January has traditionally been a fairly good month for precious metals. In particular, gold tends to do well in the run-up to the Chinese New Year (which this year took place on 29 January), while silver and platinum group metals are usually restocked by industrial firms.

Gold also benefited from growing concerns about the impact of president-elect Donald Trump's trade policy. The deficit is set to continue to deepen, with the Fed stating that it might adopt a more wait-and-see stance on monetary policy and that import tariffs could push prices higher. Real interest rates are therefore likely to remain low, which is good for gold. The metal thus climbed to a new all-time high.

Gold was also helped by continued central bank purchases. Figures show that central banks continued to buy the metal at a sustained pace in Q4, buying a total of 333 metric tons. In total, central banks once again bought over 1,000 metric tons last vear, as in 2022 and 2023.

On top of the effect of seasonal restocking, platinum group metals also benefited from disappointing electric vehicle sales and European talks over the possibility of extending the 2035 deadline for phasing out combustion-engine vehicles. Remember that these two metals are mainly used to make catalytic converters. The potential inclusion of platinum – as well as gold – among those metals subject to US import tariffs also prompted many US investors to reduce their short positions. Meanwhile, palladium benefited from fears of further sanctions against Russia, the world's leading producer.

Silver tracked the overall trend of the precious metals sector but was also buoyed by the positive demand outlook for low-carbon technologies. China seems committed to continuing with its carbon reduction efforts: in particular, it has extended support measures for electric cars and put in place ambitious renewable energy development targets. Note that Chinese CO2 emissions declined in 2024 as a result of the sharp upturn in low-carbon energy production and the slowdown in the real estate sector.

As we suspected, the guiding light for this market remains the US debt ratio. While Trump wants to lower taxes and support the economy, all forecasts point to a budget deficit that will likely push the country's debt ever higher. With debt interest already equating to over 4% of GDP in 2024, at a time when the country is going to have to refinance one third of its debt within the next three years, the cost could quickly become unsustainable if real interest rates do not correct.

That is the key factor supporting gold today, as well as the reason why central banks continue to invest heavily in gold. Meanwhile, the energy transition is driving demand for other, more industrial precious metals. All this means precious metals continue to offer significant upside, even after gaining ground in the early part of the year. Although, given the force of the accelerating upward trend, a correction cannot be ruled out in the short term, precious metals remain a good diversification solution for 2025.
